Welcome to Stealing Helen's book description. If we had a big, fancy publisher they would use this space to lie about how wonderful the story is, how it cures warts, will end world hunger and provide you with the answers to life's mysteries.

Unfortunately we don't have a big, fancy publisher, so the good news is you'll end up paying a lot less for Stealing Helen, but the bad news is you'll have to suffer through a book description written by the authors.

We hope Stealing Helen is as much fun to read as it was to write. It's not a serious polemic on the Trojan War epic. Instead, it's a humorous look at the making of the movie Troy as told through the eyes of the production's fictional historical consultant, Professor Donald Shriner.

If you've seen the movie and read the epic poem The Iliad you know that the bard Homer is rolling over in his grave, moaning much like the authors did each time the movie wildly deviated from the original story about Achilles, Hector, and Helen of Troy, the face that launched a thousand ships, or in this case, a thousand computer generated minatures.

If you haven't seen the movie or read The Iliad, the story is still worth reading if you have warts, or if you just want to be entertained by the antics of the story's main character Donald.

We're betting that if you ever fell in love with a book and then screamed in agony as the film version butchered the plot and characters, you'll be able to identify with Donald and with Stealing Helen.

Of course the story is about a lot more than making a movie. It's about people. It's about a history professor who places far too much emphasis on something as silly as demanding that our movies mirror the original source material.

While we were writing Stealing Helen, unfortunately we weren't able to solve all of life's mysteries, but Donald did find the answer to one that we hope you'll find entertaining.
